

True to his background and life, James Robert Webb is an artist who walks the line between traditional and modern country music. A native of Kellyville High School where his activities ranged from band to wrestling to FFA. Raised on a 10 acre farm 20 miles outside of Tulsa, he grew undeniably country roots while being close enough to be influenced by the Tulsa Sound, classic and alternative rock from local stations.

His last single "Makin' Love Tonight" debuted at #58 on the Billboard Indicator chart and eventually went top 40, peaking at #37 on the Music Row Country Breakout Chart. Chart expectations are high for his new single, the self penned "How That Feels", yet one thing that most fans don't know is that Webb remains a practicing physician in Tulsa. His practice specializes in bone health and helping patients that spinal surgery can't fix. That may seem an unlikely day job for a Billboard country artist and CMA member, but it's a natural fit for Webb who terms his style "Town and Country."

If you catch him live, you never know what instrument James may play, but you can be sure that his voice will captivate you with a voice that is powerful, tender and uniquely country. Influenced by the great Oklahoma vocalists Garth Brooks, Ronnie Dunn and Vince Gill, Webb has a flair for traditional country with a modern bent. Even with all that's going on, it's hard to imagine that he hasn't even released his first country album yet. His debut, PICTURES, is available now.

"So far, we've got great response from both traditionalists and modern country fans. I don't want to give too much away, but I feel like we have hit on a 'sound' for me as an artist that sets me apart and let's my vocals have the spotlight. I can't wait to share it with all of my fans."
